In Walk the Darkened Doorway you will find insights such as this:

Composure

Composure is a quality which allows one to seek neutrality amidst the urge to jump blindly to one side or another. It is what makes the difference between a decision made with emotion and one made with wisdom.

Without composure, there is only the pretense of it. While this pretense may instill confidence in those that choose to follow us (or even join us in conflict or adversity) it's like a fog waiting to be lifted as the warmth of light or the heat of battle approaches it.

True composure withstands both the light and the heat.

It instills a fear of the unknown in a potential enemy who cannot understand the reason behind it, especially when they thought they had created fear, confusion and uncertainty.

Being a model of composure enables those around you to lean on you with confidence. When you have it, those that try to intimidate you will never know if they have.

To those that wish you harm, true composure is the image of the lion with a full belly, lying in the cool shade.

You'll also find quotes like this one:

When the Master sets his table,

The edges of his cloth fall evenly on all sides and all will see and understand.

When the true Master sets his table,

The edges of his cloth fall across the laps of those likely to spill their food And only a few will see and understand.

When the truest of Masters sets his table, The edges of his cloth fall well beyond his own lifetime And only the Master will see and understand.
